....News from the New Bedford Civil War Round Table

...Thank you to those that are arriving early to help with the chair setup for our meeting. It is appreciated.

...Look for the membership annual dues renewal in this issue of the Flagbearer. It's that time of the year.

...I will include a reservation form to be completed for tickets to our Holiday dinner December 10th. We will have a deadline on ticket sales because we will need to give a final head count to the Century House well before Dec 10. Please reserve early.

Our October meeting was a great success with Professor David Kelly of the Naval War College staff, Newport. Thank you all for supporting our organization.

Our new Facebook page is getting positive attention. Don't forget to "like us" and set up "notifications". Kudos to member David Prentiss for leading this new initiative.

Although many books on Gettysburg have addressed the role played by John Buford, there is not a single book-length study devoted entirely to the critical delaying actions waged by Buford and his First Cavalry Division on the morning of July 1, 1863. Award winning historian Eric J. Wittenberg rectifies this glaring oversight.

A simple telegram from Maj. Gen'l McClellan to Brig. Gen'l Charles P. Stone on Oct 20, 1861 triggered a bloody disaster with a political fallout that held the nation's attention for weeks. This led to the creation of the Congressional Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War, and remained a thorn in Lincoln's side for four long years.

Nearly 26,000 men were wounded in the three-day battle of Gettysburg July 1-3, 1863. It didn't matter if the soldier were blue or gray or was an officer or enlisted man, for bullets, shell fragments, bayonets, and swords made no class or sectional distinction. Almost 21,000 were left behind by the two armies in and around the small town of 2,400 civilians. Most ended up in makeshift facilities overwhelmed by the flood of injured. Gregory A. Coco covers the scene extremely well.

Two Generals – In the War's Aftermath Part Two, by Round Table member Peter Rioux

General Phillip Sheridan

The characteristic military aggressiveness that General Sheridan consistently displayed during the war (Shenandoah, Stones River, Overland Campaign, Chattanooga) continued to be displayed in the military roles that he played during the postbellum years.

Upon the completion of the Civil War, General Grant appointed General Sheridan to lead a patrol along the Texas – Mexico border, which then forced France to withdraw its claims against Mexico and complete their phased withdrawal of 40,000 troops. In 1866, Grant then appointed him as a military governor for the Texas Louisiana district, where after a mob riot at the New Orleans Constitutional Convention, he proceeded to dismiss the Governor, Attorney General, District Judge and Mayor of New Orleans due to their attempt to restrict the voting rights of African Americans. Displaying his pro South sympathies, President Johnson subsequently dismissed him from this position, referring to Sheridan as an “absolute tyrant.”

In 1866, Grant then appointed him to head the military district of Missouri with the assigned responsibility of suppressing Indian uprisings in the plains. Applying the concept of “hard war,” Sheridan pursued a characteristically aggressive strategy throughout the 1870's to force various tribes to retreat and settle into assigned reservations. This vigorous enforcement strategy included attacks at Red River, Ute, and Great Sioux, as well as the promotion of winter attacks and the slaughter of bison upon which the tribes were so dependent for their survival. Sheridan's pursuit of this aggressive strategy served to severely tarnish his reputation.

In 1869, he was promoted to the rank of Lt General and was sent by newly elected President Grant as an observer of the Franco Prussian War. In 1871, he coordinated military relief efforts in the immediate aftermath of the devastating Chicago fire and imposed martial law to inhibit vandalism and rampant lawlessness throughout the city.

He promoted military protection over Yellowstone Park in order to protect its natural areas, ordering the U.S. Cavalry to control and oppose private development of the park, such as railroad construction. Military control over the park was maintained until 1916, when the National Park Service was established.

In 1883, he was appointed to succeed General Sherman as Commanding General of the U.S. Army holding this position for the remainder of his life.

In the late 1880's, he completed his memoirs shortly before suffering a series of heart attacks in 1888. He moved from Washington, D.C. to Nonquitt, South Dartmouth, MA, where he had previously built a home and so enjoyably summered. This home, 1 Shawmut Street, has since been referred to as the Sheridan Cottage. He was appointed General of the Regular U.S. Army, and two months later, he suffered a fatal heart attack at this Nonquitt location on August 5, 1888, dying at the age of 57. He was transported by train from New Bedford, MA to Washington, D.C. for the funeral service, which was attended by Union and Confederate officers with General Sherman and Sheridan's military staff serving as pallbearers. He was buried at Arlington National Cemetery.

THE SHERIDAN COTTAGE AT NONQUIT,
WHERE THE GENERAL DIED, AUGUST 5, 1888.

General Pierre Gustav Toutant Beauregard

General Beauregard vigorously advanced the Confederate military campaign (Fort Sumter, Bull Run 1, Shiloh, Petersburg) in an effort to maintain its pro slavery position, yet his post war years were characterized by his leadership in promoting black civil rights and equality.

In April 1865, General Beauregard joined Generals Lee and Johnston to ultimately convince Jefferson Davis to discontinue the war effort. In September 1866, he was included as part of a mass pardon, executed by President Johnson of Confederate military personnel. Shortly afterwards, he refused offers by the governments of Brazil, Romania, and Egypt to serve as part of their respective military commands. Three years later, he joined with other former Confederate commanders to sign a pledge accepting the results of the Civil War and emancipation.

In late 1865, he became the Chief Engineer – General Superintendent of a railroad company, later becoming its president before being dismissed years later as part of a competing investment takeover. During the next nine years, after inventing a system of street railway cars and being appointed as its president and achieving significant financial success, he was subsequently dismissed. In 1877, he was appointed to lead the Louisiana lottery system, which was subsequently discontinued by the state legislature after allegations of corruption within this system.

By 1877, Beauregard had become quite wealthy as a result of his preceding executive positions. At this time, he authored numerous articles and books regarding the Confederate military campaign, heavily criticizing the leadership of Jefferson Davis and later refusing to attend Davis' funeral in 1889, saying, "We have always been enemies."

He became extensively involved in the New Orleans Reform Party, an association of both white and black business interests whose mission was to encourage and support civil and voting rights for former slaves. This coalition was developed in an effort to moderate the control and influence of Radical Republicans, achieve white support for black civil rights in exchange for black support for lower taxes, and to assert a willingness and ability on the part of enlightened Southern leadership to achieve racial harmony and reconciliation through the pursuit of mutual interests. In a change from his previous position regarding black civil rights, he strongly advanced the view that the war was a national tragedy in the past and wanted to focus upon reconciliation opportunities for the future. He favored complete political equality for African Americans, equal division of the appointment to state offices, nondiscrimination in the hiring of laborers and various state commission directors and equal racial access in public places, schools, and railroads. He had chaired a resolution committee comprised of white and black community leaders issuing his statement that, "I am persuaded that the natural relation between and white and colored people is that of friendship." He felt that any continuing Southern resistance would be both continuously divisive and futile.

In the late 1870's, he led an effort to obtain publication of Confederate General John Bell Hood's memoirs, who had died of yellow fever, in an effort to provide desperately needed financial support for Hood's widow and ten children.

General Beauregard died of heart disease in his sleep in February 1893 at the age of 74. After a state funeral, in which Edward Kirby Smith, the last surviving full Confederate General, served as chief mourner, he was buried in the vault of the Army of Tennessee in Metairie County, Louisiana
